By FRANCES SHAFFER.

About fifty years after her death, pa-otic citizens of Carlisle, Pa., raised money by popular subscription through-out the county for the erection of a monument to "Molly McCauley, re-nowed in history as Molly Pitcher, the

And now a project is before the Pennsylvania Legislature for the erection of a new monument to "Sergeant Molly," whose heroism on the Monmouth battlefield has been singing down the years ever since the stirring Revolutionary

Everybody knows the story of the blue Everybody knows the story of the blue-eyed, red-haired wife, who followed her loyal husband at the first tap of the drum bidding him march to war. And the proposed monument has been de-signed as a pedestal surrounded by a figure of the illustrious Molly. Two bronge tablets on the monument will rep-resent her in historic roles. In the one she will be shown with her traditional nitcher, carrying water to her gunnerpitcher, carrying water to her gunner-husband and to the wounded in the stress of battle. And in the other sie will be pictured at the cannon's mouth. We know the story, read in earliest childhood days, but there is a thrill in Deed of Daring.

Months before the famous battle of Monmouth, the hardy soldiers in tent and camp were passing along the story of a deed of daring which they knew gave promise of something more in-trepid, if the need became apparent. The American forces were in retreat at Port Clinton, and the gunner lighted match to fire his gun as a parting salute to the enemy; but the match was dropped in the haste of flight, and fear-ing capture, he did not stop. Molly, right back of him, divining his intention, picked up the burning match from the ground, hurried to the gun, touched it off, then away she ran down the hill in line with the soldiers.

Then came the memorable battle of Monmouth, or the hottest day of all the

While the coatless soldiers were fight While the coatless solders were fight-ing and while her husband was sturdily handling his cannon, Molly was carrying water from a little spring at the foot of the hill. All day, through the awful heat and dust, and through the smoke and blood which were worse, the gun-ner's wife went up and down the hill, carrying the healing water to soldiers on the field and to her husband at his gun. And—you remember the story—how the last time she came up with her over-

And—you remember the story—how the inst time she came up with her over-flowing pitcher for the almost exhausted fighters, she saw her husband drop by his gun, mortally wounded; then how she heard the order go forth for the gun to be wheeled back, since no one was there to serve it. And then how, crowding back the fast-falling tears, she cast aside the pitcher and resolutely took her place by the failen gunner's cannon, it her place by the fallen gunner's cannon, calmly saying that she would fire it and fill her husband's place for the rest

Cheered "Sergeant Molly."

It was the day afterward, when the holly contested battle had been won, that the blood-stained, smoked-marked woman-gunner was taken into the presence of Washington, who presented her with a commission of sergeant in the

And cheer after cheer rang out for gallant "Sergeant Molly," and she and her little cocked hat and soldier's coat re known by the soldiers to the end f the struggle.

It is pleasant to think that there will be a fitting memorial to carry along the story of the faithful woman fighter, for there is a thrill in it from start to finish. as for me, when the thrill is over, But as for me, when the thrill is over, there is always a long, long thought of the women who suffered in silence at home, the women who took up the burdens laid down by men when they went to serve their country. Their part was so inglorious, so unsung, and so hitterly hard—the part of working and wait-

Those Who Wait.

For while the soldiers who followed the changing fortunes of our army all through the heat of many a summer and the searching cold of as many winters the searching cold of as many winters, knew little enough of the meaning of glory and learned all about the worst kind of hardeblps, my heart has always gone out to the wives, the mothers, the sisters, and the daughters who played their part in the struggle at home. For the womanfolk of the ragged soldiers in Washington's army also paid the cruel

Indeed, the burdens of war are not who nurse at the front, and who stand in the midst of things; for there is tragedy enough and there is heartache a-pienty for those who humbly wait and work on the outskirts, with their thoughts and prayers all on the fighting line.

But that does not keep us from repeat-
